Euclid City Council is pausing before making the next move on the sewer update project.

Multiple members of council this week declared that they needed more detailed information before they felt comfortable passing a resolution of support for the membrane technology that engineers had planned to present to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

Councilman David Gilliam said that he wanted to be thorough with these decisions, and that he didn't want to send mixed messages to the EPA.

Council members in the Monday meeting forwarded the resolution to the Executive Finance Committee that will meet on Monday to discuss the matter further.

Engineers from the firm working on the project as well as city service officials then spoke with the EPA

Tuesday to discuss technical aspects of the higher technology.

A decision is possible for the next council meeting March 19, President Kirsten Holzheimer Gail said.

Both the membrane technology, which is more advanced, and a clarifier system would bring the city into EPA compliance, with a significant cost difference.

The advanced technology would cost the city about $136 million.

In other city council news, the police department has received a grant that will enable it to purchase a new vehicle to be used for drug law enforcement through the Northeast Ohio Law Enforcement Task Force.

The grant comes through the Ohio Office of Criminal Justice Services and amounts to $28,000. Council approved spending no more than $31,000 to acquire a suitable vehicle.

Council also approved promotional brochures to be made by Bench Craft Company on behalf of Briardale Greens Golf Course. The brochures will be made free of charge and may then be sold by the golf course for $5 each.

The brochures will contain specific, golf-related information about the course, as well as advertising from local businesses.

Council will discuss what types of businesses to exclude from the brochures such as liquor establishments, gun shops and adult entertainment.
